

Photography involves a specific kind of material logic – a kind of articulation that differs from the way language articulates. Photographs are neither transparent nor opaque, neither natural nor arbitrary. Such distinctions are residues of the representational thinking we have to leave behind. A non-representational approach to photography is advanced by way of a confrontation with postmodernist theories. The discussion centers on the example of 19th century surveillance photography.